French Porcelain In The Collection Of The National Museum Of Science And Art Dublin

Porcelain was a relatively unknown commodity in seventeenth-century France. Examples of both Chinese and Japanese porcelain could be found in royal and aristocratic collections, but because of their cost, these objects were available only to the highest levels of society. Before the last decade of the seventeenth century, there was no domestic production of porcelain in France, and faience ...

The art-deco French vases in the salon de vases were my favourites, along with the delicate royal tea sets. But what I liked most about the Musée national de céramique was its way of showing how ceramics toe the line between function and art. Alongside practical objects like crockery, jewellery boxes and clocks were small-scale sculptures and ...
